The first American-built steam locomotive was called Tom Thumb, built in 1829. This engine rolled on only 4 wheels and rifle barrels were used as the boiler tubes. It is most notable for it's loss in an impromptu race with a horse-drawn cart during a demonstration.

In the 1841, Thomas Cook, a Baptist missionary, persuaded a railway company to schedule a special trip for the attendees of a temperance meeting. Due to the large attendance that followed as a result of his organizational ability, the railway agreed to allow Cook to continue organizing more excursions. After much success, Cook, and his son, developed the first known worldwide travel agency.

In the late 1700's, James Watt, developer of the Watt Steam Engine, would compare his engine power to that of horses so people might understand it's strength. Eventually, the power of all engines would be measured using this formula. This unit of measurement is, of course, know as "horsepower".

The first steam engines used commercially were developed in 1712.
The first steam locomotive used commercially was completed in 1813.

One of the most famous locomotives is the Flying Scotsman. It had the record for world's longest non-stop run by a train and also became the first steam engine to officially reach 100 mph.

Train horns are based on musical chords. In the US, major 6th chords are found on passenger trains, which are a harmoneous and effective signal. Horns on freight trains, though, use diminishing 7th chords, which sound much more threatening due to the dissonance.
