A sheep, a duck, and a rooster board a balloon... Sounds like the beginning of a joke. Well, in Paris, 1783, this trio was sent up for the first test flight with living creatures. After successfully flying farm animals, the inventors sent up the first "aeronauts".

The U.S. Army Civilian Balloon Corps was the first military aviation unit in American history. Thaddeus Lowe used his balloon for reconnaissance in the civil war and accidentally flew into confederate territory. He survived, and became known as the "most shot-at-man in the war".

"Balloons are dependent on the atmosphere surrounding them.
They lack the ability to steer and cannot control the wind.
They can only ascend or decend to find the elevation that will push them in the direction they need to end.
Too high and you run out of air.
Too low and you meet the ground.
If you have a planned destination,
adjust your elevation that is right for where you're bound.
Sometimes you're up and, yes, sometimes you're down.
Just keep your focus on the course and make sure you're ready when it's time to meet the ground."
